

What are my Needs?

("I need...")

A healthy relationship is built on one underlying premise: It is a relationship that is built on friendship and meets the basic human needs of the two people involved. Friendships do not exist for "what I can get"; they exist for "what I can give". My life is not just about "me"; it is about "we", and "we" includes "me" and "you". We are fellow travelers who are choosing to share a journey together to be there for one another and to help each other along the way. It is not a matter of dependence; it is a matter of sharing, support and giving what is needed for the growth of the two people involved. As we learn to give up all of the thoughts, emotions and behaviors that are expressions of our exclusive self-interests, we open up the way for an attitude of friendship. Friendship is not sacrifice; it is nurturing the relationship where both parties benefit.

To give appropriately to a relationship, it is essential to be aware of the needs of both individuals. While we both have human needs, so do we also have our individual needs. If I am not aware of my partner's needs, I am unable to respond appropriately. And if I don't make my needs known, my partner cannot respond appropriately to me. Needs also change and transform. They are not static. They rise and fall and are more or less arranged in a hierarchy given the time and place. The need that is "on top" in a certain moment or situation, will be replaced by other needs that rise to the foreground.

It is important to be aware that, when I have a need and choose to express it, I don't come from the place, "You must fill it". What I need and what you are able to meet may not always be in concert. We may have conflicting needs in a given moment and we must work that out. It is also important to make the distinction between what I "need" and what I "want" and "desire". A true need is nurturing to my existence when it is satisfied. A want, on the other hand, is not detrimental to my existence if it is not met. It is only an inconvenience or perhaps a disappointment. I won't die if my wants are not filled. If I don't get what I "want" or "desire", I may be unhappy for the moment but I realize that I can let this go.

Another important distinction to make that is related to wants and needs is demands and expectations. I can turn any want or need into an expectation and if my expectations are not realized I may escalate it to a demand. Expectations and demands are requests that are typically unspoken. I don't make my expectations and demands clear and known and so when they are not met I become upset. But I also don't generally reveal the need or want that is behind the expectation. Unspoken and un-negotiated demands and expectations, generate resentment in my partner and, instead of my partner truly knowing my deeper needs and wants, he or she only sees me as trying to control.

A further distinction to make about needs is the difference between so called "neurotic" needs and genuine needs. Neurotic needs are ones that are generally left over from my childhood and are residues of unmet genuine needs. Neurotic needs are not “bad” nor do they mean I am “sick” in any way. Behind every so-called neurotic need is a genuine need. The key is to get to, and understand, the genuine need and make it known to my partner. That way I am learning to “take responsibility” for what I truly need and ask rather than turning it into an unspoken expectation. Those kinds of expectations are really dependencies.

The bottom line to every human need is our need to be loved and accepted.

There are hundreds of different ways to express love and there are hundreds of different ways that each of us likes to be loved. If there is any one purpose to our relationship, if there is any one lesson that both of us are trying to learn, it is a lesson in love. When we can make our needs known to one another it facilitates the lesson.

The following is a general list of human needs. Go through the list and check off the ones that are important to you and then check off what you believe are important to your partner. Then rank yours and what you believe are your partner’s 5 highest needs. Then go ahead and discuss with your partner your guesses and assumptions and then take a little while to clarify each of your top 5 needs.
